

HARRISBURG STA

IT WAS A COLD DAY
FOR EMBEZZLERS.

A BANK OFFICER BROUGHT HOME

From Brazil, With a Lumber Dealer
For His Comrade—How They Were Captured.

NEW YORK, April 8.—When the Brazilian mail steamship Segurancas, from Rio de Janeiro, came up to her pier in Brooklyn yesterday there were two men strutting up and down the deck who attracted particular attention. They were A. A. Cadwallader, once the president of the National bank of West Superior, Wis., who skipped his bail while under arrest on a charge of embezzling from $40,000 to $100,000, and H. A. Botsford, formerly representative of Gray, Jenks & Co., lumber dealers, of Cleveland, who is accused of embezzling $20,000.

They had the run of the deck, but there was not a moment that they got from under the eye of a tall and wiry citizen, who had them in charge. He was Captain Charles E. Henry, a detective, who had been employed by Gray, Jenks & Co., to catch Botsford, and who had picked Cadwallader for fun. As soon as the boat was tied to the pier Chief Drummond, of the United States secret service, and Deputy United States Marshal Grant, placed the two men under arrest and took them to Ludlow street jail.

Captain Henry had a long story to tell about how he had got the men. Most of two men under arrest and took them to Ludlow street jail.

Captain Henry had a long story to tell about how he had got the men. Most of it has been told already, but there are some new features. Starting out originally after Botsford on the order of Jenks, Gray & Co., he took the steamer Alliance from New York on Christmas day for Brazil. The very first day out he made the acquaintance of Cadwallader, who introduced himself as Mr. A. A. Helmn, retired banker, traveling for his health and pleasure. The day after the boat landed Henry went to the United States consul and introduced himself. The consul showed a description of the fugitive to Henry, who immediately identified the man as A. A. Helmn. He had Helmn's address and was not in any hurry to arrest him, and he set out to find Botsford. Botsford had purchased a plantation in the interior state of Minas Ceraes.

The people of the town told Henry, when he found Botsford, what a bad man he had to deal with, and the captain got twenty-one soldier police to go with him. They arrested Botsford without any trouble. His wife, a young French girl, fainted and created a scene. The party brought the prisoner to Sao Paulo, where he was promptly arrested by local officials for an atrocious murder which had been committed in the mountains. Henry then arrested Cadwallader, who was clerking in a store at San Paulo. He acknowledged his identity and said he would return with Henry and Botsford. Henry finally convinced the local authorities that Botsford had not committed a murder.

Botsford did not talk to any reporter. Cadwallader said that the only reason he ran away was that his wife was about to be ill, and for her sake he did not want to be forced to trial immediately. Both men will be arraigned before United States Commissioner Shields today.

A Useless Battle for Love.